Learning Principles

Learning is solely driven by the learner's motivation - learners cannot be taught. Only the desire to acquire the latest knowledge and skills can motivate the learner to discover new horizons.

Learning is easier, if it is need based and relevant - Learners readily accept and use concepts which have meaning for them and are relevant to their needs and problems.

Learning is sometimes a painful process - Changing set patterns of behavior often requires giving up old and comfortable ways of believing, thinking and acting

Learning results from experience - People become independent when they have experienced independence, trusting when they have experienced trust, responsible when they have experienced responsibility.

Learning is highly unique and individual - All learners develop an individual way of learning and solving problems. As they are exposed to the methods of others, they can refine their own in order to be more effective.

Learning has its richest source in the learner's self - The learner's experience provides a wealthy source for solving problems and learning.

Learning is an emotional and intellectual process - Learners have perceptions and ideas. Learning is best facilitated when these are articulated by the learners

Learning is an evolutionary process - The ability to understand, accept, trust, confront, share and help requires a developing and evolving process. It cannot be imposed.

Learning has to be equal to or greater than the change around you
